- British English: Permits both singular and plural concord depending on semantic intention (notional concord). If individual members act discordantly, plural verbs are preferred:
- "The committee have disagreed on the allocation of research funds."

3. Contexts Requiring Plural Verbs:
When members of a collective unit perform individual, disparate actions simultaneously, plural concord is mandated in both styles:
- Correct: "The panel were divided in their evaluations of the clinical trial data."
- Stylistic Revision: "The members of the panel were divided in their evaluations..." (eliminates ambiguity).

>>Solution to Question 5: The verb must agree with its subject's number, not with intervening phrases. Pronouns must match their antecedents in number and gender, and reflexive pronouns are used when the subject and object refer to the same entity. Relative clauses.

- Relative Pronoun: 'Which' is strictly required.
- Example: "Taq polymerase, which was isolated from Thermus aquaticus, is thermostable."

When two or more words combine to modify a following noun as a single unified concept, they are hyphenated to prevent syntactic ambiguity:
- Examples: "high-throughput screening", "double-stranded DNA", "temperature-sensitive mutant", "membrane-bound receptor", "site-directed mutagenesis".

2. The Post-Noun Predicative Exception:
When the compound adjective follows the noun (in predicate position), the hyphen is generally omitted:
- Pre-nominal: "We utilized a state-of-the-art flow cytometer."
- Post-nominal: "The flow cytometer was state of the art."

3. Adverb-Adjective Combinations Ending in -ly:
Adverbs ending in -ly never take a hyphen when preceding an adjective, because the -ly suffix already clearly signals an adverbial modifier:
- Incorrect: "a highly-conserved sequence", "a chemically-defined medium"
- Correct: "a highly conserved sequence", "a chemically defined medium"

>>Solution Question Bank Base the taxonomy of adverbs in scientific discourse on their semantic and syntactic characteristics, including adverbs like 'only,' 'merely,' and 'almost.'
